Part 3

Canada turned away Jewish refugees before the Second World War. How did the Holocaust change Canadian attitudes to human rights, and why does remembering it still matter?

A good answer mentions: Change: after the war, Canadians learned what Nazi racism led to; Canada helped write the Universal Declaration of Human Rights (1948); provinces passed human rights laws, starting with Ontario's Racial Discrimination Act (1944) and the Saskatchewan Bill of Rights (1947); immigration rules based on race were dropped by 1967; Holocaust survivors who came to Canada told their stories. Why it matters: antisemitism and hate still exist today, including in Canada; remembering helps people recognize hate early and protect everyone's rights.
